Development of solvothermal and microwave techniques for synthesis of nanoparticles and sensing of chemical and biochemical molecules are the hot topics in nanotechnology and nanobiotechnology. High surface area and high-density functional groups with biocompatibility are some of the attractive properties of nanoparticles for applications in many fields, including bioimaging, biomineralization, molecular sensing, and drug delivery. Water-soluble nanoparticles consisting of polymers and proteins (i.e., chitosan, polyvinyl alcohol) have attracted considerable interest. Although polysaccharides are also water-soluble materials and well known as the biological macromolecules, they are rarely considered for the synthesis of nanoparticles because of their hydrophobic nature. The recently developed solvothermal and microwave techniques are promising and attractive platforms for preparing such materials. Herein, we review these preparation techniques and highlight applications to production of nanoparticles and sensing of various chemical and biochemical molecules. Q: Adding objects to an array of objects So I have an array of objects called differentIngredients, as follows: var differentIngredients = [{ name: "Potato", Calories: 170, image: "strawberk", url: "url" }, {

[Simultaneous determination of chlorogenic acid, p-coumaric acid and linarin in rhizomes of Polygonum cuspidatum by HPLC-UV]. To establish a method for the analysis of chlorogenic acid, p-coumaric acid and linarin in rhizomes of Polygonum cuspidatum. HPLC-UV method with Diamonsil™(TM) ODS C18 column was used for the analysis. The mobile phase consisted of acetonitrile-water (containing 0.1% formic acid) (70:30) at a flow rate of 0.8 mL x min⁻¹. The column temperature was maintained at 25 degrees C and the detection wavelength was set at 326 nm. The linear ranges were obtained in the concentration range of 0.16 to 1.50 microg x mL⁻¹, 0.41 to 2.50 microg x mL⁻¹ and 0.16 to 1.45 microg x mL⁻¹ for chlorogenic acid, p-coumaric acid and linarin, respectively. The method is reliable, convenient, accurate
