The present invention relates to a semiconductor device, and more particularly to a technique which is effective when applied to a nonvolatile memory in which a large number of memory cells are arranged in a matrix form. In a flash memory, it has been customary that the source line contact regions are shared by adjacent memory cells. This has been because the number of contact holes is in proportion to the number of the source line contact regions. To arrange the contact holes, the pattern of the source line contact regions has been made minute to decrease the pitch of the contact holes and make the pattern compact. In other words, the source line contact regions of the memory cells, for which contacts are not required, have been arranged compactly. This method, however, has made the memory cells disadvantageously small because the source line contact regions are shared by adjacent memory cells. In addition, the number of contact holes increases and the pattern has become small, so that a large number of contact holes have been required. This has increased the area of the source line contact regions occupied by the contact holes, which has increased the area of the source line contact regions 82157476af
